

Good Governance Starts With Fixing the Small Cracks Before They Become Corruption

Good government doesn't happen by accident — it happens when leaders take integrity seriously at every level. I believe in a “broken windows” approach to corruption: if you ignore the small cracks, the big breaks follow. When minor ethical lapses go unchallenged, they grow into major abuses of power. When accountability is optional, corruption becomes inevitable.

Right now, something is deeply wrong in our political system. My opponent is raising over $600,000 to run for a position that pays $18,000 a year. That's not normal. That's not healthy. And it's not what public service is supposed to look like.

When the money surrounding a job is wildly out of proportion to the job itself, people start asking the right question: What exactly are donors buying? Public trust erodes. Cynicism grows. And the system stops working for the people it's supposed to serve.

We need a different approach — one rooted in honesty, transparency, and basic common sense.

My commitment to good governance is simple:

- Fix the small problems before they become big ones
- Shine light on every dollar, every decision, every vote
- Put public service ahead of political ambition
- Restore trust by restoring accountability

Government should work for the people who live here — not for the people who write the biggest checks. Brunswick County is growing faster than almost anywhere in the country. That growth demands leadership that is steady, responsible, and focused on the public good, not on political fundraising.

Good governance isn't complicated. It's about doing the right thing even when no one is watching — and refusing to look the other way when something doesn't add up.

I'm running to bring integrity back to public service, to protect taxpayer dollars, and to make sure our government works for the people who call this community home.
